Ruminations ....

Growing up, I always hated shopping for clothes. It's not that it was that difficult. Let's face it, for most of my teenage years, it was adidas t-shirts and levis jeans, and adidas ROM sneakers. IN part, that was because there wasn't that much of a choice. My favorite t-shirt was a Beach Boys shirt for the album 'Endless Summer' with a famous 'End of the Trail' depiction on it. I was one of those unfittable kids – clothes never had the right sizes or proportions, and some of the pants had this awful and degrading 'husky' designation. It is no wonder that I grew up with a clothes size issue. Even when I was in judo, and the best shape of my life, I felt out of sorts. My grand aunts always said I had cyclist legs and a farmer's chest. I look back at pictures of my first year in the seminary, before desserts every night took their toll and I am amazed. I never considered myself anything but huge. Now this is not some therapeutic unloading. Eventually clothes were starting to be made for larger than average people. When the store 'George Richards' opened, they had shirts with extra length at the back for long torso people, and pants with a little bit more room in the legs to accommodate thighs, and shirts added extra sizes at the high end. It took a while and there was a period whenever I say a shirt in the right size I would buy it just because... Most people at one point or another have been on that roller coaster ride we call dieting. It is made all the more difficult with the messages we get from the food industry. Eggs are bad, no, now they are good. Get rid of fats, no there are good fats. Butter is bad and margarine is good, now that is reversed again. Fruit juices are good, no they are filled with sugar. Who knows any more, it is so confusing. You need a PhD to figure out what to eat. Well, it seems like this season of stars and angels has provided a 'fat angel', no not an obese angel – we call them cherubs, but rather an angel who can contend with fat. Now this Ruminations is a bit premature. At my last weigh in, I was ounces away from my mental target. Under the person we refer to as my 'fat doctor' – again he is not fat, but he is schooling me and making me accountable for what I eat, and apparently it is working. I have not been this weight since 1987. I am not at my judo fighting weight, but that's okay because I am not doing judo. The process has been incredibly easy and incredibly hard. It is easy in that I have never been that 'diet hungry' but it has been incredibly hard in terms of the restrictions, like no garlic mashed potatoes though all those restricted foods will return in moderation, with a great sense of controlled input, but alleluia they will be back. It is hard every time I pass a Pizza Pizza, or enter the grocery store as the Metro Bakery has the oven going and fresh bread coming out. It is incredibly hard when on hospital visits who pass the Subway Sandwich kiosk or the Druxy's Deli Bar. It is incredibly hard in early morning when you pass Tim Hortons and you remember the toasted bagel with cream cheese. But, every time I don my smaller waisted jeans, or my lower belt loop, or every time some one fails to recognize me right off, every time I catch a glimpse of my thinner self, I feel proud, and shocked, and happy, and fearful. It will be so easy to get carried away again. The whole journey has been an exercise in more resolve and self control than I ever thought I had. So my Christmas Angel has appeared and brought good news of great joy. Thank you Dr. Anthony. I am half the man I used to be, well not quite. I hope after Christmas to move into the next phase and my first treat will be a serving of garlic mashed potatoes and a bun.

The Week of Reconciliation

When was the last time you celebrated the Sacrament of Reconciliation?

Perhaps the most underrated and under used Sacrament is that of Reconciliation. They are myriads of reasons. At its heart, Reconciliation is about God letting us know that no matter how far we have strayed, no matter how bad we think we are, no matter how angry we think God is with us, it is never the case.

As a sacrament, reconciliation is absolute gift from God so that God can communicate the unconditional love that God lavishes on us. For that to happen though, we need to be brutally honest with ourselves. We have to discern the patterns and motivations that shape our day to day interactions with all kinds of relationships.

Most people will confess what they think are sin, but in reality are the symptoms of those things that laden our heart. When we get to the root of why we do what we do, we begin to gain insight and control as we recognize those inner motivations. The more we learn how to contend with them, we move into freedom, and freed is the point. Only in freedom can we love.

Most of us learned how to go in grade two, but our growth in understanding the Sacrament stalled at that level. A 'good confession' is one where we have looked at the list of things we consider sin, and then ask ourselves WHY. Why did I do that? What was the deep reason, not the first reason.

It doesn't matter how long it has been, the reality is that the patterns we live by follow us through life, so the same cause or motivation of sin from 40 years ago is likely the same patterns over this last week.

They say 'Confession is Good for the Soul'. If nothing else it is a tremendous source of personal growth and revelation when done well. That is why the Church offers two seasons to focus on 'metanoia' or change of heart. So muster up the courage to avail yourself of God's grace, reflect on the whys of the patterns of your interactions, and surprise yourself. "Tis the season.
